True, we did not witness those feats of Spartan valour and republican virtue. We do not remember that portentous era, When our country's existence depended upon the energy of her arms 3 when the heavens seemed shrouded in darkness, and every breeze sighed death when the infamous Pitcairn first dared pronounce the opprobrious mandate, Disperse, rebels! and the life-blood of our best citizens crimsoned the green fields of Lexington. We did not hear the appalling cry of War! Which, with the rapidity of lightning, was echoed from every hamlet in America. And 0 we did not see our fathers, when, leaving their teams afield, they in frantic rage girded on their rude habiliments of war, and, tearing them selves from all the sacred endearments of home, hastened to meet death and immortality on the ensanguined heights of Charlestown. These are things, which the youth of our country never saw, and never can...
