Excerpt from Projecting Population Change in the Interior Columbia River Basin Management of ecosystems on Federal lands takes place within a social context that, like biophysical settings, is constantly changing. Impacts of potential alternative ecosystem management strategies will differ depending on the size, location, and expectations of the human population. Likewise, these characteristics are associated with the location, type, and intensity of impacts on biophysical components. Management of ecosystems requires us to project the human population for a biologically significant timeframe, although doing so is fraught with uncertainty. By attempting to identify likely high and low population-change scenarios, we can avoid some of this uncertainty; and by indicating that we are primarily interested in orders of magnitude of change rather than precise figures, we focus discussion on possible futures rather than the accuracy of the projections.
