Excerpt from Local Livestock Markets in Relation to Corn-Belt Hog Marketing Consideration of direct marketing as such has not been a primary objective either in conducting the study or in assembling its results. It is not a question, with any competent economist or Open-minded student, whether he favors or opposes direct marketing; the question is what plan of marketing will put stockmen in a more effective selling position and lessen the burdensome spread between producer and consumer. Never have conditions in the livestock marketing field appeared more unsettled. Everything is in flux. Just what will emerge, no one knows. No longer afraid of change, all desire that if a new system is to come it may be more efficient and more economical than what has been. During the shifting process many irregularities and inequalities will appear, with resulting price penalties to stockmen. Whatever the new system may be, stockmen can expect to receive full benefits only to the extent to which they put themselves in position to claim them.
