The membrana tympani of the Balaena Mysticetus, furnishes a beautiful illustration of the distribution of reticulated nervous fasciculi, formed by branches of the Portio Dura. The large branches ramify on the white membranous substance under the cuticle, and the minute ones terminate near the inner surface of the membrane, which renders it susceptible to the slightest undulatory pulsations, and possessed also of power to accommodate itself agreeable to the will of the animal. In parts possessing great depth of muscular substance, the application of caustics may sometimes be admissible; but to a substance so thin and extended as the membrana tympani, and of such vital importance to the organ, the consequences resulting from the application of strong caustic lotions, must be fatal to the healthy action of the parts. The injection of pyrolignous acid, as mentioned in the Illustrations of Acoustic Surgery, is a...
