English-Only, No Korean! Fragile Civility: an Evangelical American School Meets Korean International Students in the 21st Century Based on five years of ethnographic research, the book examined the cross-national clash that emerged when a Midwestern Christian high school, Joshua High School, predominantly white, enrolled escalating numbers of Early Study Abroad Korean teenagers. The tensions among U.S. teachers and students and Korean internationals at the school resulted in the promulgation of English-Only and guardianship policies (i.e., students had to be residing with a parent or an official guardian). In examining these policies, she discovered uncomfortable and considerable incompatibilities between the school s staff and leadership, and the educational and social goals and expectations of the Korean students and their parents. She argues, however, that...
