Excerpt: .or the gkaid, Masoudi also speaks; he says they extended to the sea about two miles, and even describes the manner in which they were built in it. He supposes that the foundation of these walls, in the depth, was laid through the means of large bags of leather filled with air, which being tied together, the foundation, consisting of a union of stones, iron aiid tin, was prepared and fastened upon them; these bags, being sufficiently loaded, at last, of course sunk down to the bottom of the sea, whereupon the bags, being discharged of the air they contained, the foundation rested upon the solid ground, and so by degrees was raised, until it became level with the surface of the sea.--An account of this we may read in the of Katib-tchelebi, who censures this supposed mode of construction and does not agree at all with it (see Lr published in Constantinople in 1145 of the Ilijret p. 395 ) But Zakhariya-Al-Gkazvini also makes mention of this mode of constructing the Gkaid. b) The appellation of J? Gkaid (meaning chain, in Arabic) which is used in both copies of the Derbend-nameb, and which Klaproth s reads Kid and translates la digue du port, must be given to the whole port, from the chain with whicb the mouth or the passage of the port was closed to prevent the entrance or exit of ships without the permission of Guards of the sea. In some...
