Excerpt from The Improvement Era, Vol. 17: March, 1914 Your hearing was good when you interpreted the Voice to say, stay away from Clay hill. I say so, too, for the present. Finish your work in peace and go home through Bull Valley. Fur ther than this I may only tell you to keep in strict harmony with this which you call the Intangible. With this, Fred Rojer bade his son a tender farewell, and moved quickly and quietly out of the cave. Ben started up to see which direction his father would take - in fact he started up so suddenly, that he struck his hand on a stone and awakened him self from a deep sleep. The sun was low, the clouds dark, the day as chill and gloomy as before. The hills were bare, the trees naked, and no songsters in the gulch, nor musical babble from the ice-bound spring by the bog. But Young Rojer did not see it, through gloomy eyes. He believed his dream, though he did not call it a dream when he referred to it in conversation with himself. By virtue of all he had ever seen and proved and known of the great Intangible, he believed a direct message had come to him from the Intangible realms beyond the hazy distance. To the date on the wall he added another notch, deep and wide, buckled on his sixshooter, shouldered his gun, and marched down the hill and across the Open space in the gulch.
