Excerpt from The Recent Changes at Peking: And Recollections of Peking The Peking plain consists of stratified clays which turn to dust and cause dust storms. By these storms, when most violent, day is almost turned to night. Travellers, when they meet these storms, experience extreme inconvenience from the thick coating of dust which covers their clothing, faces and hands. At twenty miles, north of Tientsin, clumps of trees begin to variegate the country, and this feature is continued all the way to Peking. The hills form a semi-circle round the city on the north, the east and the west. The scenery has already become more agreeable to the eye than the dusty plains further south. On the hills there are many most attractive sites for temples. Springs in gullies rise and there originate streams which nourish groves of trees. Here monasteries are built and priests superintend the newly planted woods. From the Liao dynasty in the tenth century Buddhist temples have been built by eunuchs, princesses empresses, and superstitious Officers of the court. Pine trees are pointed out as being eight or nine centuries Old, and still growing in some of these temples.
