Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Panama Canal Tolls; The Traditional Policy of the United States in Relation to Waterways: Speech of Hon. Theodore E. Burton of Ohio in the Senate of the United States, May 19, 1914 It is much more constant than our record as regards the relation of the Federal Government to the States or upon tariff or foreign affairs. Nations, like individuals, have their distinctive qualities, opinions, and aspirations which shape their course and determine their standing among the countries of the world. Thus their movements may be forward or backward. They may advance the cause of human liberty or retard its development. They may promote International confidence or breed discord and repulsion. German Idealism has given to nations the attribute of personality. The great Swiss-German publicist, Bluntschll, says: Individual States differ like individual men In spirit, character, and form. While history explains the organic nature of the Stale, we learn from it at the same time that the State does not stand on the same grade with the lower organisms of plants and animals, but Is of a higher kind; we learn that it is a moral and spiritual organism, a great body which Is capable of taking up Into itself the feelings and thoughts of the nation of uttering them in laws, and realizing them in nets; we are informed of moral qualities and of the character of each State. History ascribes to the State a personality which, having spirit and body, possesses and manifests a will of Its own. The recognition of the personality of the State Is thus not less Indispensable for public law (Statsrecht) than for International law (Volkerrecht). The United States...
