Excerpt from China Mfn; Human Rights Consequences: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights of the Committee on International Relations, House of Representatives, One Hundred Fourth Congress, Second Session; June 18, 1996 In China, parading prisoners through streets prior to execution is not a secret. Most Chinese see such scenes with regularity. Personally, it happened to me many times. Indelibly ingrained on my mind is one such scenes. It was around 1970. In Guirang, capital of Guizhou Province, an ideological prisoner, an ordinary woman sentenced to death for objection to Lin Biao, was being escorted to be shot. I happened to be in a place between Guiyang Telecommunications Building and Chunlei Square, a downtown location similar to Tiananmen Square in Beijing. Clearing the way for the motorcade were police vehicles, followed by trucks, each with a squad automatic weapon on its top, cram packed with soldiers and bristling with rifles. In the middle of the motorcade was the truck the tightly tied condemned woman, several soldiers pulling her hair to let the mob see her face clearly. Following that truck were other trucks cram packed with soldiers and bristling with rifles. The whole motorcade, about ten vehicles in all, was murderous looking.
