Excerpt from The Bertillon Classification of Causes of Death It was, therefore, from this judicious point of View that the list drawn up in this manner was presented for the approval of the congress. This list was translated into English by Dr. Farr, into German bym. Virchow, into Italian by M. Bertini, and into Swedish by M. Berg. The single diseases defined by the congress of 1855 still exist in almost all systems of nomenclature, but do not follow the classification adopted by the congress. We find that the committee, with good reason, attached but little importance to this classification. Today, as well as in 1855, the nature of diseases is too little understood for us to attempt to decide upon a natural classification of diseases. If we pretend to do this, the progress of medical science would completely upset our work, to the great injury of statistics, to which uniformity and continuity are very essential conditions.
