Excerpt from Crops and Markets, Vol. 3: February 21, 1925 Shipments of Florida oranges to February 7 were about cars less and grapefruit about 375 cars less than to the same time last season. This seems due largely to the fact that ship ments were rather late in getting under way, although with favorable marketing conditions the difference might have been much less. On the basis of official estimates of the Florida citrus crop, this year s movement should be at least equal to last season s to a corresponding date, under the same condi tions. Although both oranges and grapefruit run heavily to small sizes, it is believed that there will be little difference in the final total volume for the two seasons, as enough new acreage has come into bearing this year to offset any difference that the smaller sizes may make. According to the Federal - State market news representative at Orlando, the December freeze in California introduced a rather speculative spirit into the market for Florida citrus, and there was a tendency on the part of growers to hold back...
