London is not England, and the fact was recognized by the patriotic men that now came to the front in the national councils of war. Moreover, the British Islands are difficult of subjugation, for a reason which every student of the map will recognize at a glance. Part of the manliest portion of the population lies in the north, and to advance in hostile force northward for so great a distance as would be necessary to conquer the entire island would be no easy task for any foe. As the days passed by, this appeared plainer and plainer. News came from abroad too that did not tend to sustain the once boisterous spirits of the French. The gallant Sikhs, Ghoorkas, Punjabees, and English were landed in Egypt, under the command of an experienced general from India--General Roberts--who had routed the French army in the neighbourhood of Cairo, and were driving the invader towards Alexandria with much rapidity. The English fleet, too, had never quite lost, by a happy piece of luck, the command of the head of the Suez Canal, and was coming through. Then news came of a great naval fight just off Alexandria, in which the old pluck of the British tar had as I sserted itself, and although a loss of a couple of English ironclads was chronicled, the victory was with the Union Jack. Ships of war were coming homewards too from the Atlantic, and a very...
